

Jenny Esposito

SENIOR HARVEST COORDINATOR
U.S. SUGAR

Clewiston, Florida

Jenny Esposito is a senior harvest coordinator at U.S. Sugar and has been helping the harvest run smoothly for nearly 18 years.

What do you love most about your job? What's one thing you wish everyone knew about sugar production?

"I love that my job is tied to something real. At the end of the day, we are a part of something tangible. It's satisfying to know that the work I do contributes to this process, even if it's behind the scenes. When it comes to sugar production in Florida, I wish everyone knew how much care and precision goes into it. From managing water levels in the Everglades Agricultural Area to using byproducts of crops to create energy, it's not just about growing sugar. It's about sustainability and protecting natural resources for the long term."

Why does it matter that America produces its own sugar?

"It matters because strong domestic production ensures a stable, reliable supply of sugar. It supports American jobs, strengthens local economies, and makes us less vulnerable to overseas disruptions. If we weren't able to reliably grow our own sugarcane in the U.S., our national food security would be jeopardized."

Interesting Fact

Jenny started at U.S. Sugar fresh out of college nearly 18 years ago and has been there ever since.
